

Published based on Point To Point Fencing: Looking To The Future

Point To Point Fencing: Looking To The Future

The end of 2010 will lead many to ask what the future holds for point to point racing, and particularly point to point fencing.

Exciting times lay ahead for point to point fencing and racing, we can be sure of that. The crowning of 15-time Champion Jockey Tony McCoy as Sports Personality of the Year is testament to this. Being the first jockey to win the award, McCoy proves that point to point is finally getting the recognition it deserves by mainstream culture.

McCoy finally won the Grand National this year at his 15th attempt, and the crowning of his BBC award is something that all involved with point to point and horse racing can be proud of. The sport of point to point continues to go from strength to strength and has a bright future ahead.

Many are asking where the future lies in terms of point to point fencing technology. The introduction of PVC products and engineering that allows fences to be repacked and built on site revolutionised the world of point to point fencing in the 20th century.

It remains to be seen what technological changes hold in store for the point to point fencing industry. Let us hope that these advancements make the sport of point to point safer, as well as tougher.

The end of a year always brings speculations on changes to point to point fencing regulations, and there are stronger rumours of change this year than ever. We can be fairly certain however, that they will remain 4ft 6inches high and be run over a period of three miles.

Every aspect of point to point has had a fantastic few years. The history of point to point is a rich one and the future looks brighter than ever. Here's hoping the next generation enjoy this grand old tradition as much as we have.

You can also find this article published on Point To Point Fencing: Looking To The Future, and on the tag pages champion jockey, Fencing, Future, jockey, pvc products, tony mccoy.