Pre-Wild Card Matches Super Bowl Team Prospects

As we get ready to enter the post year Football madness, some of the clubs that we thought we would see on the schedule in January are unfortunately missing, but to our shock and excitement for some, are some unexpected clubs, i.e the Seattle Seahawks. So as we leap in to Wildcard weekend let's examine the current Super Bowl odds, breaking it down one playoff team at a time.

There are a mere twelve teams left at this point in the season, 12 squads grasping at straws, attempting to keep the nerves down, trying to heal faster and train harder using every bit of energy and strength they have left after a touch 17 week regular season schedule. 12 squads that are hoping to kick off 2011 with a glamorous Super Bowl ring attached to their hand. The leading of the odds charts holds none other than the New England Patriots. At plus 170 prospects to take the title this year, they want it and want it poor. They destroyed the Miami Dolphins in the finale week a week ago, showing no mercy. Tom Brady and his band of merry men strike fear into the hearts of NFL athletes across the country.

The Pittsburgh Steelers rank in at number 2 in the lines at this point, with plus 550 to win it all, they likely won't have the ability to beat the Patriots, but their strength and regularity this year has ranked them up at a remarkable number 2.

Then we have the fierce Falcons out of Atlanta, tight behind at plus 600 to win. Lucky for them they've got a home schedule all the way up to Dallas. The current reigning Super Bowl champions the New Orleans Saints are going to have to kiss their double win dreams goodbye at plus 1000 to win it. These figures come from their record throughout the regular season, they did not finish super powerful in their division, so it looks like they'll have to enjoy their last month as the champs.

The Green Bay Packers double those numbers at plus 1200 to win, and then the Indianapolis Colts at plus 1600. The Colts have been a quite strong squad this season, but maybe that is because they ran their squad into the ground squeezing every last decrease of ability from each player. With a lot of accidents proceeding into the playoffs don't place your wagers on the team receiving too far along.

The last 2 squads worth mentioning in the line up are the Philadelphia Eagles at plus 1200 and the Bears also at plus 1200. The Chicago Bears have destroyed it this season and made their devotees proud, enough so to earn a 1st week off, but do they've got what it takes to go all the way up? History of course says no way. The Eagles and Michael Vick is a true triumph story, which will likely be made into a movie someday in tinseltown, or at least in a made-for-tv movie on network cable, but with all the effort they put in this year, Vick himself is pushing it if he thinks those accidents are not going to affect him in the post.
