Probably the best sunglasses in the world

Reviewing sunglasses is always terribly difficult, especially as we all have such a wide range of tastes, but in this case, we've made it a bit easier. Rather than review a pair of sunglasses and compare directly against a competitor's pair, which lets face it, could be radically different, we've cheated by comparing the same sunglasses against each other, all be it in different flavours.

The subject matter is the very popular Oakley Scalpel range, which are currently available in nine different versions. Oakley sunglasses are famed for their high quality, precision and performance and the Scalpel follows the same design ideal and pattern, there is no loss of quality in these premium sunglasses.

There is a great deal of choice across the range with different versions of black, white, brown and dark grey being available just for the frames. White chrome are undoubtedly the most striking, but for sheer style and quality, the new range of Ducati signature glasses take first place.

You get the usual choice of lens colours too with the garish blue attached to the white chrome version and the heady bright red found on the dark grey set, as well as the ordinary shades of black sunglasses.

The frames are lightweight, strong and yet still ultra comfortable with their patented UNOBTAINIUM material which is said to increase grip with perspiration. There is certainly no issue with these falling off your head, even in sports mode.

As expected for designer glasses of this quality, the lenses are of the highest quality and shut out all the sun's harmful UV rays whilst also protecting against the lesser known \(but just as damaging\) blue light. They also conform to all current lens standards set by ANSI.

Oakley market these specs as HDO or High Definition Optics and despite the obvious marketing ploy, these glasses are amongst the very best optics money can buy, so when you are looking for a top of the range set of sunglasses at under £100, the Oakley Scalpel range are 10 out of 10.
